Dr. Sudip Bose talks to students in the Little Theater on April 22. Bose is a Central graduate and worked as a military medic in Iraq.

Dr. Sudip Bose, a Central graduate and frontline doctor during the Iraq war, returned to Central to share his experiences and promote his new TV series, “Desert Doc,” to students on April 22. Students had the opportunity to view the series and discuss Bose’s experiences as a doctor in war and at home.

“Desert Doc” follows Bose’s work at Medical Center Hospital in Odessa, Texas, a high-level trauma center. The series was released earlier this year on Amazon prime.

The event was organized by Central's Veterans Club and attended by its members as well as any students who were interested in hearing him speak.

"Dr. Bose reached out with exciting news that the filming that was taking place over the past years came to fruition," said Nicole Figi, a Veterans Club sponsor and event coordinator.

"[Bose] was hoping to share the message of 'Desert Doc' specifically with students from Central."

Earlier this year, Bose visited Central to speak at the Veterans Day assembly with a focus on his work in Iraq.

"Before, when [Bose] came [to Central], it was geared towards Veterans Day recognition," Figi said. "This time, it is really more towards students who may be interested in the medical field."

One of Bose's main messages to his audience was his goal of helping people take control of their mental and physical toughness.

"Education is the keyword. What we can do is help people understand so they make the best decisions."

"My dream for the world pertains to health care," Bose said. "We can't fix our healthcare system without taking control of our own health. Education is the keyword. What we can do is help people understand so they make the best decisions."

Dr. Bose believes in the importance of returning to Central to share these messages and inspire students each time he returns.

"It's always great to come back to Central," Bose said. "I am hoping that I can inspire students to go beyond what scares them. Courage is not the absence of fear, it's just knowing there's something greater."
